THE ABOLITION OF THE LASH IN PALESTINE

For some little while public opinion in Palestine and in some enlightened circles in England was agog over the discovery of the use of the lash in the prisons of Palestine. It appears that the supplementary punishment was meted out with particular generosity to political prisoners. Now, while under certain circumstances it may be permissible to imprison persons who hold opinions at variance with the political doctrines of the ruling majority, the feeling will not down that such offenders deserve to be treated with more respect and less severity than ordinary criminals. People who will risk their safety and freedom for the sake of ideals may be imprudent and annoying but they will call forth a sneaking admiration even in those who are impatient with them. The barbarous practice of whipping political dissenters in the Palestine jails met with universal condemnation the moment it became known to the general public.

The good news has just reached us that the British Government upon being apprised of the situation has issued instructions prohibiting the objectionable procedure. Prisoners in Palestine will be dealt with in the same manner as offenders in England. Treatment which is regarded as medieval and reprehensible in England under the aegis of English law will not be tolerated in Palestine.

THE SLATER CASE

Oscar Slater who served twenty years in prison on the charge of murder has recently been adjudged innocent by a court of appeal in England. This case has been one of the most remarkable instances of the miscarriage of justice in the annals of the British courts. At the time of the Slater trial, and since, there was reason to believe that Slater's Jewish origin was a factor in the verdict. It was thanks to the intervention of Sir Arthur Conan Doyle that the Slater tragedy was not allowed to sink into obscurity. Doyle applied the sleuthing acumen with which he endowed his famous hero, Sherlock Holmes, to the investigation of the circumstances surrounding the case. He came to the conclusion that Slater was innocent. For years he worked to arouse public interest in this unfortunate judicial blunder. Finally success crowned his efforts. Slater was liberated. Then a court of review re-examined the evidence. And now Slater stands completely exonerated and vindicated. The judicial authorities and officials who were connected with the trial have been stingingly rebuked by the higher court.

It is notorious that Slater was the victim of a momentary mood of anti-jewishness which somehow managed to creep into the halls of British justice. It must be noted that at the time there was no machinery for reviewing the case by a higher court. The instrument of revision has been created since the trial.

Slater is now an old, broken man. The twenty years of incarceration have sapped his health and vigor. The British Government is now considering awarding him a monetary compensation. This is probably as much as can be done under the circumstances.

Jews throughout the world will be delighted at the news of the righting of the old wrong to the unfortunate Jew. The Jewish feature of the case was made much of, when Slater appeared guilty, by enemies of the Jews. It is not unfitting that the Jewish people should take notice of the exoneration of the man who had suffered so much largely because of his Jewishness.

THE CONFERENCE OF THE ACTIONS COMMITTEE

At this writing it is not known yet what decision the Zionist Actions Committee at its conference arrived at with regard to the Agency Commission report. The radical, labour, and progressive factions have all united in their opposition to the report. The Poele Zion, the Revisionists, and the radical Zionists are vehement in their condemnation of the plan submitted by the Agency. And the "Regulars" are by no means unanimous in their support of it. Ussischkin, the doughty old warrior, has sensed the danger to his favourite institution, the National Fund, and has aligned himself with the opposition. Arthur Rupin, the economic expert of the administration, is inclined to be compromising. He would adopt the report with modifications. He has not been too flattering in his estimate of the findings of the experts in the field of economics. All he would concede to them is sincerity and good intentions. Weizmann finds himself in a peculiar position. He was a member of the Agency Commission and apparently concurred in its report. Now, at the Actions Committee he is obliged to hold out for the adoption of the report. At the same time he cannot help recognizing the justice and soundness of the complaints of the opposition, and is offering to accept certain modifications. His difficulty lies in the fact that the criticism touches not details or incidentals but deals with fundamentals. It is a question of approach to and basic formulation of the Zionist situation. Tinkering with the report will not cure it of the fundamental weakness of its point of view and attitude.

Now, if the Actions Committee will reject the report it will mean the repudiation of Weizmann and his policy. Some of the opposition have for a long time been outspoken critics of Weizmann and ready to push their opposition to the extreme. Others have mildly disagreed with Weizmann's policies but have stopped short of desiring his deposition. But at the present moment it is a question of basic principles. If they will remain loyal to their conceptions of the Zionist situation and reject the Weizmann policy they will have to place themselves in a position of requiring Weizmann's resignation. Weizmann will have to stand or fall by the Agency. The rejection by the Actions Committee (world Zionist Executives) of the Agency report is tantamount to the rejection of Weizmann.

We believe that the present situation is as critical as, if not more critical than, the situation at the time of the Uganda decision. Zionism stands at the cross-roads. Weizmannism is tending in a certain direction. This direction is not acceptable to a large body of conscientious and devoted Zionists. The decision that will be made in the near future will be fateful to Zionism.

A Builder of Colossal Miniatures

By ABRAHAM CAPLAN

Bird's Nest, Virginia, cannot be described as a place where a 19-year-old immigrant boy, possessed of an artistic urge that would not be denied expression, could appease his hunger for education and training which would fashion for the world a craftsman of uncommon skill. Nevertheless, it was to Bird's Nest that such a youth had come. Twenty years ago Louis Rosenthal, a Jewish lad from Plungyan, Lithuania, arrived in that townlet, his mind all a-thirst for the miraculous transmutations of life in America. But to Bird's Nest his railroad ticket directed him for no other reason than that members of his family had preceded him there. Bird's Nest to this day is as bucolic and somnolent as its name would imply and as a small Virginia town of any other name might be surmised to be. It offered to an ambitious stripling determined to carve for himself a niche in the pantheon of fame, or perish in the attempt, as much as Plungyan, which was hardly more than a clearing in a primeval forest. So Rosenthal, his eyes flashing by no means their first discontent, turned his face to Baltimore, the front door to the southland and the mother community of hundreds of Jewish settlements scattered throughout the States along the balmier side of the Potomac. In Baltimore, Rosenthal had been told, there lived a noted Jewish sculptor, Ephraim Keyser, and there also was the Maryland Institute, and, closely identified with it, the Rinehart School of Sculpture with Keyser as its directing spirit. On beholding Rosenthal, Ephraim Keyser at once discerned that the large-headed, raven-haired youth who had carved in wood, wrought in marble and in lighter moments mused in pen and ink sketches was meant for fruitful discipline. Rosenthal was advised to attend the evening drawing classes at the Maryland Institute, and, having prepared himself in the fundamentals, immediately entered the Rinehart School of Sculpture.

As a student of sculpture, Rosenthal hewed closely to the classical lines adhered to by Keyser and the group over which he wielded an influence. From the other members of his class Rosenthal was distinguished not by reason of any novel departures, but by a uniform excellence in work and a sustained awareness by those in authority of his obvious gifts.

After completing his scholastic apprenticeship, Rosenthal had visions of further training under European masters. These visions remained just visions. Before long the young artist, amply schooled in poverty and tried by financial disability since coming to America, realized that he was not to be quickly overtaken by zealous acclaim and the moluments of a full-blown recognition. The atmosphere of Baltimore a decade and a half ago was not especially conducive to the enlargement of youthful talent. Rosenthal, speaking harsh gutturals imported from his native Lithuania, failed to gain an entrance into the city's stodgy artistic circles, then dominated by lethargic, uninquiring traditions. Not even the prosperous men of affairs among his co-religionists who collected works of art for the adornment of their homes quite appreciated the significance of his work. They saw in him an aspiring artisan in clay, and no more. They left him to his own devices.

Before long Rosenthal found himself face to face with a crisis. The spectre of privation haunted the young sculptor's studio. More than once the impact of necessity persuaded him to return his back upon his art, hide his exquisite bronzes in a moldy cellar and seek a livelihood as a factory hand. To those who know Rosenthal's life intimately, the facts of his struggle for artistic integrity constitute an epic of courage and stamina of peculiarly dramatic power. Only his own moral strength and the dauntless faith of his friends enabled him to nullify the insistent notes of cynicism which invaded the innermost corridors of his being.

It was in the darkest days of his career that Rosenthal embarked upon a unique phase of the sculptor's art. This stratagem in a few years raised him to recognition beyond the borders of his adopted country and won him rewards which not even the purple dreams of early manhood dared envisage. He consecrated his endeavors to works in miniature. With an impetuosity which dazzled all who had come to know his previous work he proceeded to infuse into figures of one inch or two inches in height the very characteristics which had given his larger works their enchanting quality. Resourceful in thematic material, Rosenthal's task became one of finding enough time for substantiating the numerous subjects which peopled his fancy. The role of his penknife was that of a very wonder-working artistic wand. History, Bible lore, mythology, poetry, sociology, the martyrdom of his people—interminable are the concepts which have acquired translation into throbbing figures of bronze, gold and silver. His dancing dryads fairly leap for joy. His satyrs and centaurs grimace and taunt. Those of his miniatures, like the "Blind Beethoven" and "The Deluge," which sound the note of immortal tragedy, are as overpowering as though they were figures of heroic dimensions.

In the field which he chose for his restless activities, Rosenthal appears to be a solitary worker. The vitality, the tenderness, the glow of life, the laughter, the humorous effervescence, or the stark vehemence of his figures come as mystic evocations from the touch of a strangely gifted artificer. His group sculptures evince startling effects of power. When he finds himself in an impassioned mood, his little figures lift themselves up in the manner of giants straining for battle with the gods.

In his latest work, the Lindbergh Miniature, he achieves elemental virtuosity. By means of eighty figures he summarizes with encyclopedic detail the significance of the flier's epochal performance. The plan of the composition suggests a perfervid wish to achieve the definitive. With a wealth of figures culled from history and the artist's own prolific fancy, crowding the scene, the effect of the work, even in its present inchoate stage, is that of a synthesis of the strivings, struggles and triumphs of the human race since the dawn of history.

Louis Rosenthal did not content himself with modelling figures of sinuous loveliness or of devastating power. He determined to overcome the immemorial difficulties involved in casting miniatures successfully. After laborious experimenting, he discovered the precise proportion of the materials entering into the process by which tiny figures are perfectly issued.

When he completes the monumental Lindbergh miniature, Rosenthal will cast it in gold, silver and bronze. Unless the unlikely occurs, the casting process will bring to light every deft profile, every articulate line, every sinewy muscular projection, every glistening surface, every detail by which the historic figures are instantly recognized. Should he wish to reproduce this colossal miniature, he will readily be able to do so by means of his casting process. And if several copies should be desired, he will cast them with relative ease.

By the grace of poverty and the World War, Louis Rosenthal is an American artist without the slightest qualification. All the training he has had he obtained in Baltimore. In Baltimore, also, he experienced the trials which at times embittered him, and in the self-same city he finally merged the victor, tasting the fruits of triumph. Succeeding the indifference of previous years, there are now dinned into his ears the almost adulatory plaudits of the people of his adopted city and the initiate elsewhere. At thirty-nine, he is a member of several years' standing of the Royal Society of Miniature Painters, Sculptors and Gravers of England. He has exhibited in Gibb's Gallery and in the National Galleries, in the Baltimore Museum of Art, Corcoran Art Gallery and the Greek Embassy at Washington. Two of his miniatures have been acquired by the Metropolitan Museum of New York.

Last summer Jacob Epstein, Baltimore merchant prince and art lover, purchased from him a collection of twenty-two bronzes which he placed on exhibition in the Baltimore Museum of Art.

Dr. A. S. W. Rosenbach—Napoleon of Books

By AVERY STRAKOSCH

Recently an American book dealer, Dr. A. S. W. Rosenbach, at Sotheby's Auction Rooms in London, purchased the original manuscript of "Alice in Wonderland," paying for it the record price of £15,400 ($75,259). It was a dramatic moment, for he was bidding against the British Museum and feeling ran high that the precious document, written and illustrated by Lewis Carroll's own hand, should remain in England. After the sale, Dr. Rosenbach offered to resell to the British Museum for the price he had paid and himself promised the first thousand pounds towards the purchase fund—"But if the manuscript is going into private hands, we want it."

Dr. Rosenbach's face is like the red, red Skookum apple. Perhaps this is why you experience a slight shock when you first view his stocky figure. It would be more logical if the most famous dealer in rare books in all the world were a doddering old man with a long beard.

His intimate friends call him Rosey, and this name describes him—both his person and his mind, especially his mind — more accurately than any other adjective I know. Free of the most hallowed American inhibitions, he is an out-and-out Elizabethan, mooning occasionally for the days of Willie Shakespeare and Ben Jonson.

Dr. Rosenbach was born in Philadelphia fifty-one years ago. His father, a manufacturer of cotton goods, was a man of good education, but it is from his mother's family that Dr. Rosenbach gets his scholarly mind. There were seven children, not much money, but a great many ideas in the Rosenbach family. The children were to be educated thoroughly at any cost.

The little boy — Abraham Simon Wolf—wasn't ten years old when his mother noted that he had more than the average child's desire to read. Further, he seemed to be peculiarly sensitive to the physical characteristics of books and reacted in a far from childish way to a fine binding, paper exquisite in texture, or beautiful type. Mrs. Rosenbach was not surprised. Her brother, Moses Polock, was a gentle bibliophile, who passed all his waking hours in a crowded little bookshop on Commerce Street in Old Philadelphia. Little Abie was blessed—or cursed—with bibliomania.

Moses Polock really shaped the pattern of Dr. Rosenbach's career. He taught him the essentials of the book collector's business, and constantly poured information into the child's mind. When he was eleven Uncle Moe sent him forth to the auction sales, and told him to use his own judgment in bidding. Old habitues in the famous Stan V. Henkel's auction room could hardly believe their eyes when they saw a tiny boy with excited, lustrous eyes bidding up the works of Poe, Lamb and others.

It was not until his second year at the University of Pennsylvania that he made his first remarkable discovery. At an auction, in a pile of dusty pamphlets, he suddenly recog-

"Palestine" Benjamin

By GABRIEL COHEN

More than fifty years ago Henry Brownlow's grandfather had been known as Avrom Judelsohn, until ten years' residence in England and a growing fortune had shown him, long before his contemporaries, the simplicity of changing one's name by deed poll and the really tremendous social advantages which speedily accrue to a foreign Jew bearing an English name.

Can it, then, be a matter of surprise that his grandson, Henry, bore the name of Brownlow proudly and as of right? Even his almost Saxon appearance was no longer a matter of favourable comment by his Gentile friends. Wasn't he one of themselves? Hadn't he been at Harrow and Cambridge with many of them, and hadn't he at times joined with them in ragging Kahn, that strange fellow at John's, who never was to be seen with his head uncovered or partaking of forbidden foods? Well, no! Not even his servants suspected Henry Brownlow of his recent Jewish origin.

In spite of having travelled so far from the ghetto, where his family had originated, Henry aspired to enter still further into those circles which he believed to be closed to Jews, a reference to whom still made him feel a little uncomfortable and cringingly Jewish.

One can imagine with what pleasure then he received the suggestion from his neighbour Grierson that his name should be put forward as a candidate for the Chanticleer, an exclusive club, where business men and professional people met together in an atmosphere redolent of the fringe of society.

He accepted the nomination with some trepidation, but after all he felt himself a little different from Abramson, a business acquaintance, who was obviously Jewish and who had been black-balled in spite of vigorous canvassing and efforts to secure election. He at least had a legitimate business, a pure English name, and, thank God, so fair and unJewish an appearance, as to cause himself to feel as English as any of his numerous friends.

Henry regarded his election as of so great an achievement in his social climb that he felt bound to celebrate his good fortune by giving a select little dinner party to which were invited his particular friends among those who were already members of the Chanticleer.

Over coffee and cigars conversation turned to the political position in the Near East, and not unnaturally the British position in Palestine was freely discussed. Opinion seemed to be evenly divided in favour of and against the British Mandate, but of the few, violently opposed to it, Henry Brownlow might be said to be the centre, and he took his stand as a British taxpayer, forced to finance a ridiculous and costly experiment to solve what some people were rash hardy enough to term the Jewish problem. As far as he could see there was no Jewish problem, as there was, and could be, no Scotch or Welsh problem. Great Britain was accepting a responsibility which was burdensome and unprofitable.

The discussion ended by Dickenson remarking that he would have to introduce a friend of his to Brownlow, who would soon become a confirmed Zionist once he had been in his company. Dickenson assured everybody who would listen to him that he had become a Zionist himself as a result of a friendship which he had formed with a Jewish colleague in the Colonial Service, who was now an official in Palestine.

After Dickenson's mention of a Jewish friend with a Zionistic bias, Henry Brownlow would have avoided him as the plague, but after all, Dickenson was influential in the club, and perhaps his Jewish friend would not materialize from Palestine for a considerable time, so that Brownlow's uneasiness began to wear off under the influence of the pleasurable glow which he invariably felt as he ascended to the imposing entrance of the Chanticleer.

Continual appearance in the club premises and a widening circle of acquaintances from among members lulled that every present, though, perhaps, never very pressing fear of being discovered as a Jew, so that it came rather as a shock to Henry Brownlow when one afternoon he noticed in the smoking-room a tall, pleasantly tanned man, comfortably seated and reading the "Times." How on earth came an obvious Jew into the august precincts of the Chanticleer? A moment's consideration made him give vent to a sigh of relief. After all he had been a member for close on a year now and he had never seen among the members, the majority of whom he knew, one face which betrayed the slightest sign of Jewish origin; this must be a visitor. Could it be Dickenson's friend? Anyway, it didn't matter, as long as he wasn't a member, his Jewish appearance would not be a source of continual irritation.

As the room began to fill for the usual hour's chat and cocktails before dinner, Brownlow noticed an ever widening circle of men round the stranger, who seemed to be holding a veritable reception. He caught the name of Benjamin spoken heartily several times and was at last dragged to be introduced to the "only Jew in the Club, 'Palestine' Benjamin," whom he found to be accepted, as only as unassuming man can be, and apparently more popular than any other member whom Brownlow knew.

Homeward bound, Henry Brownlow found himself wondering at the phenomenon of a professing Jew being not only a member of this most august and exclusive of clubs, but also a most welcome and popular person, whose popularity had more than survived an absence of more than three years. This was astounding and he, for the moment, wondered whether, after all, it was syspected or not that he, Henry Brownlow, might be one of the "Chosen Race."

Benjamin was on leave for six months, before he returned to Palestine and during the three weeks which had elapsed since his arrival in London, Brownlow's ears had constantly been offended on almost every occasion when he visited the club by open reference to "The Palestine Mandate," "the Jewish people," "Jewish Nationalism," "Zionism," "the duty of every Jew" and a host of phrases in which the words "Jew" and "Jewish" figured prominently. The strange part about it all being that although Benjamin rarely seemed to raise his voice, he was still the centre of interest and had by the strength of his sincerity and personality not only interested many of his friends and acquaintances in the Zionist experiment, but had actually produced one or two keen Gentile Zionists, who, in the zeal of new disciples, attempted to convert all and sundry to their views.

The standing joke of the smoking-room was a lost bet through which "Palestine" Benjamin, as he was invariably called, had made a member collect a hundred pound for the Jewish National Fund from among the loser's friends.

This state of affairs was more than irksome to one who had regarded himself as emancipated from the Jewish yoke and Henry Brownlow avoided Benjamin, as much as he was able, while still maintaining his attitude of opposition to the British Mandate for Palestine, until his aloofness became noticeable and his opinion on this matter, almost an isolated one.

The vexation of spirit which "Palestine" Benjamin's blatant (it is Brownlow's adjective), Jewishness brought to Henry Brownlow banished from the latter's mind almost the very existence of Dickenson, who nevertheless, on his return from a protracted visit to the continent, became one more of Benjamin's satellites.

Dickenson had not, however, forgotten Brownlow's attitude at the dinner party, months ago, and determined that one more opponent should succumb to the arguments quitely, but firmly put forward by Benjamin, whom he greatly admired, and he, too, arranged a dinner to which he was careful to invite the people, whom he had seen were a never failing source of pleasure to Brownlow, whose snobbish tendency had been a source of amusement to many of his fellow members.

Once again the conversation was turned to the political situation in the Near East, and once against Brownlow spoke for the poor burdened British taxpayer, whom he said he personified, but this time he spoke with rather more diffidence on account of the presence across the table of "Palestine" Benjamin, who had become his bete noire in so short a time.

Benjamin's knowledge both of government administration in Palestine and Zionist activity running parallel and often outstripping it, drove Brownlow in distraction from his opinions, which in the light of indisputable facts appeared less than the broken reeds which they were and forced from him almost without his knowledge a confession that he, too, was a Jew.

After the dumbfounded hush which fell upon the table, Brownlow tried to show that the Jews themselves did not want a national home, and that he was typical of the Jews all over the world who, for the most part, had assimilated themselves to their environment, and did not want in the very least to associate themselves with Zionism.

Brownlow's own uneasiness at his confession communicated a restlessness to the gathering which caused it to terminate within the verge of abruptness, and he left with a hopelessness that only the expressions of contempt for his concealment of his Jewishness, which he had seen on more than one of his friends' faces, could cause.

Brownlow continued to be seen at the "Chanticleer," but for once he actually felt that hidden barrier, which he imagined to exist against the Jew in some circles, closed against himself, while Benjamin, "Palestine" Benjamin, continued in his popularity, an accepted Jewish gentleman.

Brownlow is no longer a member of the "Chanticleer," but just occasionally one hears his name mentioned in connection with some minor Jewish communal activity.—Jewish World.

Dr. Jacob Katz, rabbi of Montefiore congregation in New York, and Jewish chaplain at Sing Sing prison, once made a suggestion that deserved wider publicity than it got. He urged that money for Jewish education should come in part from the sale of Holy Day seats. He said that Jews will be giving money to individuals who have undertaken private enterprises in halls and theatres for the Holy Days, thus diverting funds that might go to Jewish education. As he said, "Jews who are engrossed in money-making and are indifferent all year seem to turn to God, Israel and the Torah at the Holy Days." They are in the proper frame of mind to be sold the idea of almost any Jewish cause. Most of them do not belong to synagogues and are willing to pay in the money for their seats to any individual who can supply the scene for religious services. Thus a great deal of cash goes from private pocket to private pocket instead of to a Jewish institution or cause. It is surprising that communal leaders let this condition persist. If a group of Jews must hold Holy Day services in a lodge room, hall or theatre in preference to attending some synagogue already established, then the hustling manager of such an enterprise should direct it under the auspices of a synagogue, movement or Jewish institution. Numerous individuals live in comfort from the business of staging Holy Day services on a big scale. Synagogues or Talmud Torahs should undersell them and put the money in the communal treasury.

Some time ago a Gentile reader of this column wrote to ask: "Why is it that Jews do not take to drunkenness, although they are not Prohibitionists? I have never seen a Jew who was a confirmed drunkard nor have I ever seen a Jew drunk anywhere."

One answer to this man's question might be that the Jew does not take to drunkenness for the very reason that he is not a Prohibitionist. The Jews solved the matter of liquor and the children by never once assuming that it might turn into a problem. Non-Jews in the States might have learned from their Jewish neighbours how to handle the terrible curse of drink but they neglected to do this. Non-Jews were the ones who were thrown out of American saloons in the old days and brought into police court as drunk. They had been impressed with and warned about the dangers of a life dampened with even small amounts of alcohol until they probably rushed to drink so they could drown out the warnings.

It was and doubtless still is a purely Gentile custom to offer a boy an amount of money or some other gift if he can abstain from drinking (or smoking) until he is twenty-one. The Jewish boy often hears what a disgrace it is to drink as a Gentile drinks, that is immoderately. The Jew sees wine and whiskey as early in life as he sees a chair or a table. There is always wine on the table for religious ceremonies and the children smell it and taste it when the grown-ups do.

Drunkenness has never been a problem of the Jewish people but it quite likely will become one in the States as a result of the Prohibition craze. Jewish boys who would never think of carrying hip flasks probably do as the others do now and carry drink with them to places where they can't buy it. Ida M. Tarbell, historian of the Standard Oil, and well-known as a lecturer, said recently in the Delineator, that she saw drunkenness breaking out in new places and drinking habits fastened where they never were before. It will be surprising if this affliction of the majority does not affect the Jews heretofore so markedly abstemious.

When prohibition was spelled with a small letter and confined to holier-than-thou homes, where drink was denounced volubly and in horror, Jews were out of earshot. But now it is one of the national American evils and the mother of more evils and is enforced upon the attention of all. The Jews always knew how to drink with pleasure, and with restraint but without apology. They never smirked behind light wine and beer bottles. If they wanted stronger liquor they never feared that it would cause the flames of hell to mount higher or that it would hurt the drinkers any more than tea with lemon if drunk in moderation. Even the small children, as has been said, are often seen in a state of taking it or letting it alone. If they let it alone it is because they haven't been forced to. If they try soul-stirring liquid they may dislike it so intensely that not even a Christian missionary would see a reason to talk about the danger of their taking to drink.

Of course some people will say that the Jewish religion with its accompaniment of wine with the asking of blessings, and also its many laws that govern eating and drinking may have something to do with the Jewish ability to drink and not get drunk. This column believes the secret lies in the fact that no one hides the bottle from the youngsters or locks the buffet door with a bang and a Puritanical tightening of the lips. In this regard the Jews of Canada will have less trouble than those in the States where the snooping figure of Prohibition pokes a meddlesome finger into private life and personal liberty. Under its influence there even the Jews may find it hard to prevent drunkenness among their own in the future.

"Living One's Own Life"

By DR. BENZION MORRISON

Some time ago a friend and I went around canvassing for a certain institution, and we were fairly successful. The majority of people contributed, some giving less, others more, than we anticipated. There were also "non-givers," and various reasons were given for turning us away empty handed. As time went on we became quite proficient and knew what answers to give to the "objectors."

I must confess we undertook the work half-heartedly. We, ourselves, had not the enthusiasm or confidence required to make a success of our undertaking. At the committee meeting, at which the names of members of the community were distributed, we selected only such as we considered amenable to our canvassing powers.

How does one find oneself dragged into such affairs? Very simply. You happen to be present at a general meeting convened to deal with some communal matter. You come there without ever having given a thought to the matter. Problems concerning the community as a whole are never really taken seriously. "Everybody's business is nobody's business, you know!" But, some day, you find yourself at a public gathering in a closely packed hall.

The close proximity of friends and the thundering voice of a chairman are the indispensable factors in the conversion of a man, who usually abstains from communal matters, into a public-spirited person. This is just what happened in our case.

Before we looked around, my friend and I were included in the "committee" appointed to deal with the matter for which the meeting was convened. We tried to escape the honour, but there was no way out.

Once appointed, we wanted to make a success. Strange to say, the arguments we brought to bear on our victims had the peculiar effect of converting us into earnest and successful protagonists for our cause. But we were horribly shocked one evening when we addressed ourselves to a gentleman who definitely refused to give us any support.

As we had done so frequently that day, we thought out a plan of attack before we approached him. His attitude towards communal affairs was known and considered. His record from the point of view of contributions was bad—he was recognised as a very "hard nut."

His attitude to the institution in question was also known to be unsympathetic. Yet we thought that, failing arguments, his gentlemanliness might come to our rescue, for he had the reputation of being a "gentleman." We realized that there were some people who often gave a donation, not so much to a cause as in mark of sympathy with the foot-sore, well-meaning canvassers.

And so we approached the house. Before ringing the bell, we had many misgivings. Our persuasive powers were to be put to the test. We were about to tackle a Jew, who was still within the fold; who had not yet completely severed his relations with his people. Due to a foreign accent and an orthodox upbringing, he failed to become completely assimilated with the non-Jewish element, although he fought hard against the old yearnings and did things against his own inborn inclinations. Here was one who was a Jew in spite of himself. He brought up a large family, and has managed to enthuse into them an utter dislike for his own people. What he failed to do for himself, he succeeded in the case of his offspring. They detested the race to which they belonged, and the father was proud of this achievement.

This was the kind of Jew we were setting out to convert to our cause, but, flushed with the excitements of the day, we were not faint hearted. We rung the bell.

The door was opened and we were shown into a moderately well, but somewhat coldly, furnished drawing-room.

The gentleman soon made his appearance; he was cold but courteous, and quietly enquired the nature of our visit. We stated our cause in the best way we could. We were brief, but to the point. The institution was well worth the earnest consideration of every right-minded Jew. It required assistance badly. The building was in a dilapidated state. There was already a big overdraft at the bank. The executive had reached the end of their tether. Unless the renowned charitableness of our people was clearly manifested, the noble work which had been carried on with consumate success for several years might have to be drawn to an untimely conclusion. Such an eventuality would throw a blot on the community. We produced a list of names of almost all the representative Jews of the city who had contributed various sums.

He glanced at the sheet of paper which we handed to him, and hesitatingly looked up. "I really must congratulate you on the success of your efforts. Your cause is very deserving and I hope your institution will flourish. I am glad you have already achieved so much. I sincerely wish you every success; carry on with the noble work. Even if you meet with a few disappointments, I know you will not be discouraged. But as for myself, I am extremely sorry to tell you that I don't interest myself in communal affairs. I am afraid I can do nothing for you. I like to live my own life."

We realized that our forebodings had only been too-well founded. We wished him good-bye and departed from his house.

I have met the gentleman several times since. I often see him at my hotel, and we occasionally exchange a few words. On one occasion I found him reading the "Zionist Record," and I very guardedly raised the subject of Jewish nationalism. "I am surprised to find you interesting yourself in the National movement," I said. "I have been a subscriber to this magazine for many years," he replied. "I love to read the news from Palestine, especially when I am away from home. I am extremely taken up with the progress and development there. Palestine as a home for the persecuted Jews has always appealed to me." "I am glad to see," I remarked, "that you have at least one breach in your wall where canvassers might penetrate." We both smiled.

"You are again wrong," he explained. "I don't contribute to the Zionist funds; you have never seen my name in any list of donations. I prefer to live my own life. It is true that the only way open to the poor Russian Jews is Palestine, but, personally, I am quite happy here. My heart beats fast when I hear of the great potentialities of the present attempt to regain Palestine for the persecuted Jews. I went to the Hebrew University celebrations some months ago, and they were really a great success. I was glad to find that they had the good sense not to make a collection."

Weeks later, I again came across my "gentleman." Out of curiosity, I asked him whether a well-known collector for the Chevra Kadisha had approached him for a donation. "I wish they would leave me alone," he replied. "your friends are always pestering me. They can keep the Shool and the Beth Chayim for themselves. I am prepared to stay away from both, as long as I live. And when I die—well, let them tax me. Every year they extort fifteen guineas from me for a seat in Shool, which I occupy but a few hours. That should satisfy them, the money grabbers! Don't think me bad; I am as good as the next man. All I want is to live my own life. Why can't one live his own life? Why has a Jew to live a life which will please his next-door neighbours—Reb Jankel and Reb Zorech? Everyone has responsibilities, without constant calls upon him from agencies from Yeshibos, institutions, and all manner of schemes? If you don't contribute, you are dubbed a Meshumed and an anti-Semite. I have had to work hard for my money, and I mean to keep it. Now that I have become fairly well off, I have no intention of giving tithes in biblical fashion. I want to live my own life. I prefer my Gentile friends to my Jewish compatriots—the others don't come around begging every Monday and Thursday, and the rest of the week."

I still tried to argue with my remarkable "gentleman": "I believe you still include yourself among our people? Had you entirely severed your relations with them, you would most certainly have been left alone. But since you still call yourself a Jew, you must bear the burden."

"Look here, my man," was the retort. "You must not become too personal. You have already proved to me that you are no gentleman. Among the people with whom I associate, one's own private affairs are never discussed. That is just why I foster the company of my other friends. I don't see why I should not be allowed to do as I please. Why can't a man live his own life?"

"It is absolutely impossible," I still continued. "It strikes at the very foundation of our racial consciousness. However much we will resent being our brother's keeper, we carry the burden of all the Jews on our shoulders. Our forefathers surrendered all claims to individual liberty when they answered the call of Moses in the land of the Pharaohs. By liberating a race of slaves, he enslaved the individual."

"Still, for the life of me, I don't see why one can't live one's own life," he said. "I, for one, am determined to."—Zionist Record.

A report from the Union of American Hebrew Congregations discusses the rise of the standards of Jewish teaching throughout the country as witnessed by the growth of teacher associations on the one hand, and the insistence for trained and intelligent leaders for Jewish education on the other. Much assistance is given towards this progress by the Commission on Jewish Education of the Union and of the Central Conference of American Rabbis which is concerned largely with the providing of curricula for religious schools and text books for instructions.

NEWS FOR FANS

In the games of the week of July 16th, U.L.P.S., after defaulting to Bnai Brith, gave the lodge team a good battle in an exhibition game, losing 6 to 0, while in the second game on Monday night, Judaean Benevolent defeated Y.M.H.A., 10—7, in an exciting game. Al Cohen, of Judaeans, got four hits, with Balmy Cohen of the "Y" team and Shimmerman getting three each. On Tuesday night, Mac Cooper, the genial prexy of the league, pitched his Mount Sinai team to another win, defeating the leading Sunnysides, 13 to 5, Pullan getting four hits with Cecil Simonsky getting three. Tuex got back into the running in the senior loop by defeating Hasmonians 10 to 2, with Harry Sniderman being the big noise in his team's win, coming late, after coaching his Pat's team of which Bobby Rosenfeld is a prominent member. He put up a fine game at shortstop as well as getting three hits, while Milt Weiss was also good at third base, with Lennie Mehr also being a big hitter. On Wednesday night S.A.M. lost to Herzls, 7—0, with hits being scarce, Rothbart allowing five to Applebaum's three. The frat team played good ball, except in the third inning, when Herzls got all their runs. In the second game, the league all-stars, under the management of Bob Freeman, again showed their superiority over outside teams, the smart Rice Lewis team of the Industrial League being victims by 2 to 0, in a most exciting game. Fifteen players took part for the all-stars, and all played good ball. Dunkelman, who pitched the first five innings, and Robinson, who twirled the last four innings, allowed only two hits each, Beatie getting two, while Bille Gold and Willie Sniderman got a two-bagger each.

The regular schedule finishes the latter end of next week. Fans note that in the event of the additional schedule not being published in the REVIEW, games will take place every Monday, Tuesday and Wednesday, in the month of August. Results:

nized the original edition of Dr. Johnson's Prologue, the one written especially for David Garrick to recite the night the Drury Lane Theatre opened. Frightened lest some older bookman realize the pamphlet's value, he cautiously bid it up ten cents at a time. At last it was his for three dollars and sixty cents. A month later a wealthy collector offered him five thousand dollars for it. He has never parted with the book.

Immediately after his graduation in 1898 he was given a fellowship at the university and began to teach English. But as his early mania for books was growing out of all proportion to the time he had to devote to it, he resigned to start his own business—the buying and selling of rare books, and this practically without capital. He continued to accumulate his stock. Most of the books he bought at auctions, but sometimes he picked up bargains when estates were being settled. He had an unerring instinct for bargains, and as his resources grew he bought finer volumes. Often he could not afford them, and had to go without food to pay for them, but after holding them for a time, he would sell at a profit of two or three hundred per cent. Even then he saw a future in which rare books would sell for thousands of dollars. He lived frugally, always saving, and alert to snare the future rare book.

Thanks to his uncle's training, he knew the devious byways of the book-dealer's trade. He knew, too, most of the wealthy American collectors, and remembered their individual idiosyncrasies, noted the books they longed to possess, and often located them. They not only bought from him directly, but appointed him on a commission basis to attend sales for them.

As his bank account grew, so, too, grew his bids in the auction sales. Other dealers thought him mad, and were angry that he insisted on pushing prices to ridiculous heights. The late Henry E. Huntington watched Rosenbach's antics and was amused at first, then impressed, and finally engaged him to help assemble one of the greatest libraries in the world.

Does Dr. Rosenbach ever regret his rash living? Aren't his shelves sometimes overstocked? The answer is that no one has ever heard him complain about the scarcity of customers. In 1925 he paid $106,000 for a Gutenberg Bible, the highest price ever given for a book at auction, and before the year closed this great volume was presented to Yale by Mrs. E. S. Harkness.

In 1926 he bought a mere signature — that of Button Gwinnett, who signed the Declaration of Independence —for $51,500. A few months ago a first edition of Kipling became his for $14,000, the highest sum ever given for the work of a living author. Is there any wonder his bids are still considered rather wild? At Sotheby's in London they call him the Terror of the Auction Room—which means, he says, the highest bidder and therefore the greatest damn fool. In Paris he is referred to as "Le Napoleon des Livres." In this country, for years, he has been affectionately dubbed Doctor R. (He received his Ph. D. from the University of Pennsylvania in 1901.)

* * * *

Doctor Rosenbach divides his life between New York and Philadelphia. In the latter city he has two more collections of great and valuable books. The second one, the most extensive of the three, is housed in the large store on Walnut street. With his brother, Philip, who deals in and is a connoisseur of English and American furniture, paintings and old silver, Doctor Rosenbach keeps shop. They live in a fine early nineteenth-century brick house on DeLancey street, which they have restored and furnished with a delicate taste and an eye always to comfort. It is in this house that Doctor R. smacks his lips over his third, his very own collection. Here he reads, dotes on these treasures which no sum can buy from him.

Four days each week in the City of Brotherly Love the brothers Rosenbach solemnly carry out the Mosaic laws. They eat kosher food prepared by an excellent Irish Catholic cook, and each Friday evening celebrate Shabbas amid fine old mahogany and Waterford glass lighted by seven candles. Some of George Washington's own silver reflects the ceremony from the mantelpiece.

Often the desire for less simple fare comes over them. In an apartment over their store they retain the best colored cook in Philadelphia. There with friends who come from all parts of the world, collectors as a rule, they gorge themselves on Southern delicacies. After such gastronomic ordeals it is not strange that Dr. Rosenberg returns to New York in a dark mood.

* * * *

His mania for books is, of course, Dr. Rosenbach's existence. Yet he has another maniacal desire, a perverseness really, to make you believe he is exactly all that he is not. He delights to be thought close, yet constantly gives surreptitiously to the needy. He would have you picture him a grouchy fellow, gun-shy of women, yet women like him because he has as real an understanding of the feminine mind as of the most complex work in his collection. He poses as the harsh critic, although you will seldom hear derogatory words from his lips. He does occasionally dip into the cauldron of life about him to stir up a little trouble, for he delights to referee a good scrap between friends, but as he has made an art of innuendo, it is difficult to lay actual blame at his door.

Scholar — he was recently made a Doctor of Fine Arts by his Alma Mater—reader, collector, he has already published two books over his name. "The Unpublishable Memoirs" came out several years ago. Last November "Books and Bidders" appeared, and in it he has related with abandon the secrets of his book-life.

He would rather be a bookman than anything else in the world. He believes the book collector gets more fun out of life than other men, and he has statistics ready to prove that he lives longer. (New Yorker.)

Observers are interested in the problem facing the Roumanian Government since the Union of Christian Students refuses to disband under the edict so to do recently promulgated. It appears that on the success or failure of this move by the Government will depend, in a great measure, the proposed Roumanian $60,000,000 loan.
